Doctor, doctor...

KATY MANNING, Dr Who's pretty companion, should be a junior Diana Rigg. 'I'm supposed to crack safes and pick locks, Avengers-style,' she says. As Jo Grant, she has been adventuring with the Doctor since the New Year - currently they're facing The Daemons (Saturday 6.10 BBC1) - 'but really I need looking after.'

Though she may exaggerate her helplessness for the cameras, the real-life Katy needs protecting too. 'I'm always in a muddle,' she says, 'always one step behind myself, but Jon is so stable and marvellous. He's for ever picking up my scripts or whatever it is I've left behind me.'

Jon often drives Katy to rehearsals to make sure she arrives. One day on their way to a location he asked her what route to take. 'I was frowning at the map' she says, 'when Jon leaned over and said "For goodness sake, Katy don't you think it would help if you looked at the map the right way up?" And reading through the script for The Daemons we found an identical scene had been written in.

'I'm as blind as a bat with out my glasses and I fall over a lot,' she says. 'We went to film The Terror of the Autons at Dunstable and in my very first episode I had to run across a heap of rubble. Away I went calling my usual lines "Doctor! Doctor!", fell flat on my face and twisted my ankle.'

Though she receives plenty of fan letters, she didn't realise how concerned viewers were about her until she went filming for The Daemons. 'There were always crowds of village children around us and they'd say "Jo, are you going to be all right?"'

Jon Pertwee: Travelling without the Tardis

Who else...

With a rapidity matched only by the speed of his voice changes Jon Pertwee is, at the moment, dashing up and down the country in a succession of cabaret appearances which, as he says, take him back to the grass roots of his profession. 'It does one good to experience this direct contact with an audience again,' he comments. 'The Dr Who image doesn't stick too hard fortunately. Occasionally someone will ask me where the Tardis is, but mostly I'm just accepted for what I am.'

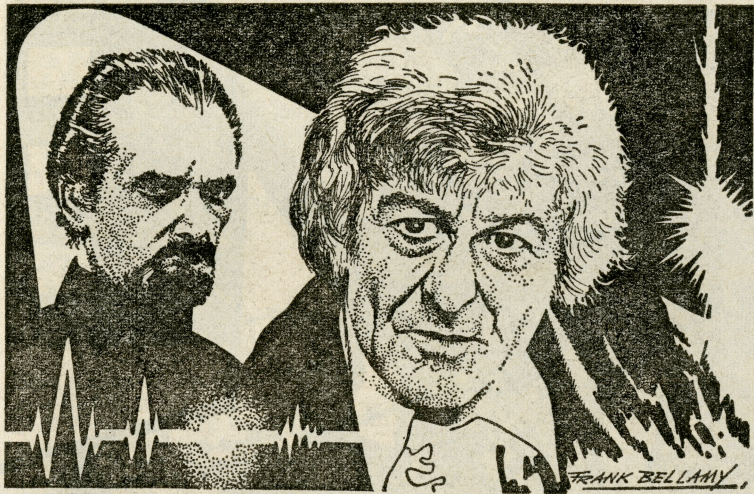

At the end of his cabaret run which takes him to places as far apart as Edinburgh and Weymouth, Pertwee will return to London—his home is in Barnes, 'The Beverly Hills of South London'—to make the second in a series of classics recorded on tape for children. The first was Alice in Wonderland; the second is Treasure Island. Then there is a new Dr Who in January—and The Navy Lark goes on for ever.

Pertwee can be heard this week in a new panel game chaired by Clement Freud, Right or Wrong (Wednesday, 6.15 Radio 4). It's apparently less valuable to know the answers to the questions than it is to mislead your opponents into thinking you do. Other participants include John Cleese, Barbara Kelly and Andrée Melly.

Return of THE DAEMON

How one fan's forethought saved a classic Doctor Who adventure – and an evil foe – from black-and-white oblivion. By Richard Johnson Technology was always a Time Lord's saving grace. Whether it was a sonic screwdriver or a time control unit to project an intergalactic jackanapes into his own time-loop, Doctor Who has had the appropriate device since he first materialised in 1963. Now technology has come to the Doctor's rescue once again, by restoring The Daemons – a classic 1971 story starring Jon Pertwee.

During the 70s it was common practice to make two copies of television series – a colour version on videotape and a black-and-white version for sale to countries not yet broadcasting in colour. With the rise of the Doctor Who cult in the late 70s, it was discovered that the tape-lords at the BBC drama department had junked the colour original of The Daemons.

According to Adam Lee, archive selector at the BBC's film and videotape library, "Video was never looked upon as a long-term preservation format. And television itself was seen as ephemeral, so some programmes weren't kept. Who would have predicted that The Flowerpot Men would be a number one video 40 years later? Or, come to think of it, Doctor Who?"

Former Doctor Who script consultant Ian Levine was one of the first to realise what was being lost. "In 1978 I got wind of a Los Angeles TV station that was going to transmit a two-hour version of The Daemons. I wired a fan the money to hire a Betamax machine and buy two one-hour tapes – tapes only played for an hour in those days. He changed tapes in the middle and did a compilation for me. I went to the TV station a few weeks later to try to buy the original but they had already wiped it."

Levine, as it turned out, owned the only colour tape left in the world. But the picture wasn't sharp enough to be broadcast. The black-and-white masters were, but fans wanted to see The Daemons as nature had intended. Then, earlier this year, BBC graphics designer Ralph Montagu worked out a way to restore the series to its full glory. He joined forces with James Russell, a videotape systems designer, and used the American recording as a colour key for the black-and-white original.

"The problem was making the two versions line up exactly," says Montagu. "Without computers it would have looked like a piece of rather bad printing." By adapting existing technology, Montagu re-coloured the series. Where scenes had been edited out of the American version, the pair coloured the black-and-white film by hand. Taking 30 seconds over each frame, and with 25 frames in every television second, the five-part series was a labour of love.

For the BBC there are considerable financial rewards. Just ask Adam Lee. "We recently recovered some missing film recordings of the Tomb of the Cybermen from Hong Kong, and when they were released they went to the top of the home video chart – selling more than 25,000 in ten days." So it's no surprise to learn that the library is now busy restoring several series.

With 110 episodes still missing, Ian Levine's work is far from done. He is still chasing possible leads. "My phone bills are a good few thousand quid." He has tried writing to television stations, but most don't even reply. "Iran actually said, 'In the name of Allah, what are you talking about?' Then you discover an episode in the basement of a Mormon church, or in a television relay hut in the middle of the Nigerian outback, and it's all worth it." RT
